INTRODUCTION

THIS Book is intended to serve as a memorial of the Training College in Kildare Place, Dublin; and of the work in the promotion of Primary Education in Ireland which it has accomplished during the last hundred years.

In the pages that follow, the Principal, Dr. Kingsmill Moore, has traced the history of the College throughout its eventful career. Primary Education as a system can hardly be said to have existed in Ireland when the Kildare Place Society began its work in the year 1811. Progress has been slow, but steady; and during the last few years its pace has been decidedly quickened.

Formerly it was not at all so clearly understood as it is now that teaching is an art which has to be acquired. It is now recognised that those who hold the responsible office of teaching children should not only be themselves well instructed in the subjects they have to teach, but also be carefully trained in the art of teaching, and in the best methods of managing a school. This College, from its foundation, has kept this fact steadily in view, and has been fulfilling its office with zeal and efficiency. But it is since its reconstruction as a Department of State Education twenty-six years ago that it has reached the high position which it now holds, as the Church of Ireland Training College, under the able administration of the Principal, and the Staff associated with him.

In the Department of Secular Education the students are trained for their future work according to the most approved methods, under the control of the Board of National Education. The children of our Church, when they come under the charge of teachers thus prepared, have, therefore, the advantage of receiving an education in our Primary Schools which enables them to compete successfully with their fellows in the race of life.

But, further, it is a distinguishing feature of our College that the most careful attention is paid to the religious and moral training of the students. They are not only fully instructed in the principles of religion, as held by our Church, and trained in the best methods of giving religious instruction to their future pupils, but also every effort is made to render the whole tone of the College of such a character that the students may carry away with them the impression that all true education rests upon a religious and moral basis, and that they may go forth to their work as teachers resolved, in God's strength, to devote themselves to it on these lines.

The importance of the training given in the College, in both these departments—secular and religious—cannot well be exaggerated ; and the fact that the teachers it trains are in request for Church Schools all over Ireland, is in itself a proof of its marked success and of the confidence reposed in it by the Managers of our Schools.

It may safely be said that the College is well equipped for its responsible work in all respects, except one. A College for the training of teachers ought to be provided with a Chapel, it is incomplete without it—a building separated from secular uses, in which the students can meet for daily prayer and worship, and for hearing addresses upon missionary and other subjects bearing upon the Church's work.

It is proposed to commemorate the occasion of the Centenary by the erection of such a building. Plans have been prepared by an architect to enlarge and adapt one of our present buildings so as to make it suitable for the purpose. A sum of £464 has been already provided, mainly by the gifts of past students, who have always shown, in a tangible form, their deep interest in the College, and is available as the nucleus of a fund for this object. It is believed that the whole project could be satisfactorily accomplished for about £2,500. This unique occasion could hardly be commemorated by a more fitting memorial ; and the Governors hope that the proposal will meet with the generous support of the friends of the College who understand and value the good work it has done and is doing for the Church.

I

A Hundred Years ! what mighty revolutions
Have swept the world within their crowded span !
Empires have fallen, and new powers uprisen,
But never since this God-built world began
Has knowledge so outpoured
The treasures of her hoard,
Nor Earth so graciously revealed her plan.

II

A Hundred Years ago, in time of trouble,
There came from Irishmen a new demand,
'On all alike confer the boon of knowledge,
And blessings rich will sooth, and heal the land,
So soon as all engage
In study of the page
Of Scripture, and unite—an earnest band.'

III

Forthwith the voices of a grateful people Uprose in welcome, and the teachers came
From far, and toiled in gathering wisdom's secrets ;
And once again our Island won a name
For learning ; all confessed
That Erin's Schools were best,
And numbers told the story of her fame.

IV

A Hundred Years have sped, and still the teachers
Flock to our Halls and toil, and still we pray
That God will fill them with His great ideals;
Still is our aim to send them on their way
With hearts attuned, to bring,
As servants of the King,
Fit preparation for a brighter day.

A Hundred Years! a teeming wealth of knowledge Poured forth for good or ill, with smiles and tears!
How have we used it? What has been our progress
In work for God? What of the coming years?
We answer, If men trace God's smile upon our face,
All must be well—no room for fears.

PERIOD I

1811-1831

IN the autumn of the year 1811 a number of private gentlemen met in Dublin, and founded the Society for the Education of the Poor of Ireland, which soon became known generally as the Kildare Place Society.

All through the eighteenth century the only education planned by England for Ireland was one which aimed at alienating the Irish from their religion. Proselytism was the natural complement of the Penal Laws. It remained for these Dublin gentlemen to discover and inaugurate a new policy. The modern expert would describe as 'undenominationalism' the system they invented. In the absence from contemporary language of the specific word, these pioneers gave expression to their aims by saying that the leading principle which governed them was a desire 'to afford the same advantages for education to all classes of professing Christians without interfering with the peculiar religious opinions of any.' So far back as 1786 this plan had been formulated in connexion with a large Dublin School; it sprang into national prominence when the limited and local school committee developed, in 1811, into The Society for the Education of the Poor of Ireland.

Accustomed as we are to-day to the postulate

that every child must be educated, we commonly forget how extremely modern this universal education is. Yet not many years have passed since instruction was considered the poor man's bane, instead of his blessing, since duty for many seemed to consist in barricading, rather than in opening up the paths of learning. When George III. expressed a wish that every poor child should be taught to read the Bible, a medal was struck forthwith to commemorate a sentiment at once so revolutionary and so uncommon.

It is necessary to recall these facts if any adequate estimate is to be formed of the calibre of the new Society. Had these Dublin enthusiasts accomplished nothing they would deserve honourable commemoration for the boldness and comprehensiveness of their initial programme—education for all without interference with the religion of any.

When once the novelty of the aspirations of the Society has been grasped it will be less difficult to picture the magnitude of their task. The extent of this task may be expressed in condensed form by a single word—everything. If we except the genuine desire for learning which has always been characteristic of the Irish, there was nothing upon which the Society could count as an asset. In its ultimate analysis the work of education implies—teachers to teach, buildings in which to teach, and apparatus to supply the means of teaching. If the work is to be permanent, it further demands skilled supervision to encourage excellence, and detect failure. To-day each of these divisions is entrusted to a separate organisation. We look to the Training Colleges for our teachers, to the localties for the buildings, to the publisher and furniture manufacturer for apparatus, and to the Government for supervision.

For all these requirements the Society for the Education of the Poor of Ireland looked solely to themselves ; and, furthermore, they expected from their own resources, and the interest they hoped to arouse everywhere, to provide all the funds required for their colossal enterprise.

Not less remarkable than their courage was their foresight. They made no plunge haphazard into a work whose complexity only became apparent as it proceeded. From the outset they had clear vision of the duties which lay before them, and they made ready for their full discharge.

The first report is busy with plans for the training of teachers. Unwilling to wait until in possession of a Training Institution of their own, they made temporary arrangements with the large school already mentioned, engaged a training master at a salary which was nearly half their available income, and began to train teachers just two years and two months from the date of their foundation.

Equally prompt were their plans for providing suitable school buildings. So soon as funds permitted, grants towards the building and equipping of schools became a regular part of the system ; but here also so much as was possible was undertaken at once. If they could not build schools themselves, they could, at least, teach others how to build them. Even before the commencement of training they prepared and put into circulation a twenty-four page 'Tract' upon the subject. 'The little book is a model of clear arrangement and good print. Directions are given as to sites, roofs, floors, plans, windows, doors, and fires. Careful measurements are supplied. The whole is illustrated by three excellent plates. Two are ground plans of schoolrooms of different sizes. The third consists of working drawings of desks, adapted for being fixed either on boarded or in clay floors.' *

It was the same with the required apparatus. In 1811 there were no school books in the modern sense. The custom of the day, wherever children were instructed, was for each to bring what

what book he chose, and to stumble into the reading of it as best he could. The Society immediately set to work to supply the deficiency. In 1813 they published a 'Spelling Book' and a 'Reading Book.' These were followed by works on Arithmetic, Needlework, Geography, Geometry, Trigonometry, and Mechanics. They also issued a 'Schoolmaster's Manual,' which gave a full and clear account of the system of school management practised in their training school, and they compiled a series of 'Cheap Books' for the purpose of supplying their schools with Libraries.

The fourth of the specified requirements—supervision—from the nature of the case came later; but so soon as teachers and schools were ready, inspectors were set to work, and the closest watch was kept on the progress made and the results obtained.

With such evidence before us of courage and foresight, it will cause no surprise to be told that the work thus planned was soon crowned with remarkable and signal success. The early history of the Society reads like the narrative of a triumphant progress. Their liberal policy met with welcome everywhere; men of all religions united in working with or for them. They tell us in their Second Report that 'the improvements lately introduced into the systems for the education of the poor have become the subject of discussion among the enlightened, and even the theme of conversation among the fashionable, and wherever mentioned every tongue seems eager to expatiate upon the happy consequences which must result.' What men thought of the work is shown by the readiness with which the leaders both in politics and society identified themselves with the Committee. The Duke of Kent became Patron, The Duchess of Dorset and the Duke of Leinster, Vice-Patrons ; a number of the most prominent of the nobility accepted office as Vice-Presidents ; Daniel O'Connell, and many others equally well known, enrolled themselves as members. Nor was it long before the Government began to take a practical part in the chorus of approval. Mr. Peel, afterwards Sir Robert, was Chief Secretary. He believed in education, and he believed in the Society's plans for educating the Irish. He himself early became a subscriber to their funds, and he was not long in coming to the conclusion that the Society formed a fitting channel for the expenditure of any funds Parliament might be induced to vote.

Much as the Committee appreciated the confidence of such a man as Peel, they viewed with mixed feelings the prospect of State subsidies. Instinctively they foresaw the dangers involved—on the one hand, restricted freedom; on the other, accentuated jealousy and unrestricted criticism. Had they been free to choose they would have respectfully declined the tempting offer. But the funds placed at their disposal from voluntary sources, though liberal, considering the time, were so far out of proportion to the magnitude of the work that there was really no course open but to accept Parliamentary assistance, if their plans were to be carried into operation.

All serious difficulties with reference to finance having thus been laid to rest, rapid progress was made in every direction. A central and important site was procured, from which came the short title commonly used henceforth—the 'Kildare Place Society.' Great schools were built which embodied all that was best in the educational architecture of the period. Accommodation was arranged, first for masters, and then for mistresses, to come from all parts of Ireland to be trained. A large Depository was opened for distributing school requisites, either in the shape of free grants, or at lowest prices. Soon applications for help in founding and maintaining schools came pouring in from all quarters. To meet them, a careful system was devised for stimulating local activity by central help. Wherever a willingness to co-operate and to contribute was shown, grants were made, first, towards the building and equipping of the schools, afterwards in aid of the teachers' salaries. Finally, all Ireland was mapped out into eight inspection districts. Such was the interest and enthusiasm evoked that men of high social standing and marked ability accepted service as inspectors at extremely moderate salaries. Not alone did they carry through the work of inspection proper with a care and exactitude which has not since been surpassed, but they also planned schools, superintended buildings, and, in general, acted everywhere as convinced and active propagandists of the Kildare Place ideals and system.

What the Society, thus organised and thus assisted, succeeded in accomplishing may be summarised as follows:—From the Training School went out each year some 150 masters and some 60 mistresses; the total from 1814 to 1831 was nearly 2,500. Each year about 60,000 copies of the 'Cheap Books' were sold; by 1833 the output amounted to upwards of 1,500,000. From the first, Libraries were attached to every School. In 1822 separate 'Lending Libraries' were begun; they numbered 1,100 by 1831. The Schools founded or assisted by the Society increased steadily until they covered the whole of Ireland. In 1816

there were eight; in 1831 they had spread into every county and had risen to 1,621. Pupils to the number of 137,639 were in attendance; the average per school was between 84 and 85.

In the face of such a list of achievements it will be no surprise to hear that the Society, which, in less than twenty years, could accomplish so much, had attained to a European reputation. The fame of the Kildare Place Schools procured them the honour of a visit from the man who was probably the chief educational expert of the time. The Count de Lasteyrie travelled from France to see for himself the Model School in Dublin; and he felt his time and labour so well repaid that he pronounced the School to be the best in existence, and said it should serve as a Model, not only for Ireland, but for every country in Europe.

From Scotland numbers of distinguished visitors crossed and inspected the Schools in the Counties of Antrim and Down. Professor Pillans, Professor of Humanity in the University of Glasgow, and well known at the time as a writer and lecturer upon education, devoted a season to a detailed study of the Kildare Place system, with the result that he felt compelled to admit, reluctantly, that the Irish schools were a hundred years ahead of those in Scotland. Very generous also was the tribute paid by the British and Foreign Society. In their Report for 1822 they say 'it must be peculiarly gratifying to every friend of his country to learn the rapid strides which education continues to make in that island. . . . This Society has spread blessings over Ireland'; and in the Report for 1824 'the Committee turn to Ireland with feelings of grateful exultation. The Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor is advancing with gigantic strides. Supported by the munificence of Parliament, and managed with great zeal and prudence, this Society becomes every year more interesting and important. The success of the past year is most exhilarating.'

It will presently be our duty to glance at the causes which brought to a close this brief but brilliant career, but first a word must be spoken as to the spirit of the men who planned and guided the Society. Space will not permit the mention of more than a name or two; this, however, is the less to be regretted because the conspicuous feature was the way in which the Committee and its Sub-Committees worked together as a whole. Not self, but the cause, was their guiding principle. Especially prominent were Samuel Bewley, a Quaker, and Joseph Devonsher Jackson, afterwards Judge of the Common Pleas; but there were many others who gave ungrudgingly of their time and talents. As they were for the most part either busy merchants or professional men, the beginning was the only portion of the day available. Accordingly, 8 a.m. was the hour of meeting. A hurried breakfast, and a long session took place once a week for the General Committee. The permanent Sub-Committees, of which there were six, were also expected to meet weekly. At periods of pressure they had often to adjourn from day to day ; daily meetings of one or more Committees were not uncommon at Kildare Place.

The secret of the remarkable success which attended these zealous workers, seems to have lain in their readiness to absorb everything that was good in the systems of the time, together with their capacity for original development. As we have seen, some of them had had considerable experience in school management before the foundation of the Society. In the large Dublin school, with which they had been connected, many of the improvements usually associated with Dr. Bell or Joseph Lancaster took independent origin. It was so with the principle of class teaching, and the monitorial system. This, however, did not prevent their inviting Lancaster, who was on tour in Ireland at the time, to be present at their early meetings of Committee, and they made him a handsome payment for the right to publish his books. Similarly, when an official head became necessary they appointed a master, John Veevers, whom Lancaster had trained. When he came, they explained that he was at liberty to graft upon the Irish system any of the Lancasterian methods which promised to be profitable, and they encouraged him to press forward on his own account, upon new and original lines. John Veevers responded enthusiastically to this treatment. He proved himself a genius in the work of educational organisation, and as such he deserves an honourable place among the pioneers of Elementary Education.

In the Rev. Charles Bardin, who had charge of the literature, the Society were equally fortunate. Ready always to sink his own personality, he made full use, upon honourable terms, of all books that seemed suitable. He was, however, no mere compiler ; the long series of interesting and instructive works, which he wrote or arranged, show him to be an author and editor both versatile and original.

With reference to the work of the Committee themselves it only remains to be added that, notwithstanding the vastness of the labours which they undertook, and the largeness of the grants with which they were entrusted, their services were rendered gratuitously ; even the expenses of their breakfasts were all privately defrayed.

THREE VIEWS OF A SILVER SNUFF BOX

Presented in 1832, by the Inspectors of the Kildare Place Society, to J. Veevers, Superintendent of this Model Training School, and Chief of Inspectors

Their spirit shows itself finely in the reply which was given to the astonished Royal Commissioners who investigated the working of the Society in 1825. 'Do you receive any remuneration?' they asked Mr. Jackson. 'Not pecuniary,' was his answer. 'I apprehend we shall receive ample remuneration hereafter from witnessing the improved state of the country.'

It is now time to ask how it happened that, notwithstanding all this educational efficiency, the Government Grants were withdrawn in 1831, and the duties of the Kildare Place Society transferred to the National Board.

The explanation lies ready to our hand—it was the Simple Bible Teaching that made the continuance of the grants a political impossibility. At first sight it seems strange that a principle which had always been of the essence of the Society's policy should admit of success for a time, and yet in the end ensure destruction. Nor have there been wanting those who accused the Committee of departing from the broad-minded toleration which had been their most attractive characteristic. For such a charge as this, no foundation exists. Alterations there undoubtedly were; they took place, however, not in the Society, but in their environment. Truth to tell, at no time was any warmth of welcome shown for the fundamental rule which insisted that in every school the Scriptures must be read 'without note or comment.' It was in spite of, not because of, this requirement that Kildare Place flourished. The Established Church was never enthusiastic in its support. Its members objected to the prohibition of doctrine. The Roman Catholics patronised only because no other means of education seemed within their reach. They had the strongest objection to compulsory Bible reading, and whenever it was possible they avoided compliance with the rule; but they recognised that the Committee meant to deal fairly by them, and they gave them credit for discountenancing the proselytism which had previously prevailed. Accordingly they refrained from opposition in the early years of the Society's success. Their children attended the schools, they were represented not only in the Society, but on its Committee.

It remained for O'Connell to inaugurate the movement which was destined to change accepted alliance into open hostility. Recognising what the power of the Priests could accomplish, and perceiving that for the sake of controlling the education of their people they would be willing to rally to his side, he commenced his attacks upon the Society in 1819, beginning with a demand for reform from within. As we have seen, O'Connell and many other Roman Catholics were members. They attended the Annual Meeting of the Society, and proposed a resolution calling for a radical change in the constitution. The speech of O'Connell is extant. The Society took pains to have it preserved. It denounces with bitterness the rule which insisted on the reading of Holy Scripture, and in the name of the Roman Catholics proclaimed war, unless the rule was abolished. When a majority of those present declined to entertain the proposed alterations, O'Connell and his supporters withdrew, and founded straightway an opposition Society, with the avowed object of ruining Kildare Place, and obtaining for themselves the administration of the public grants.

The step thus taken was fraught with momentous consequences, not alone to education, but to the whole future history of Ireland. It has been usual to date the Emancipation agitation from the founding of the Catholic Association in 1823. In reality the foundation date should be 1819. What made the agitation practicable was the attack on Kildare Place, and the sense of unity and power which resulted.

Clearly, however, as all this can now be seen and understood, there seemed at first no likelihood of danger to the Education Society.

 Wholly

Wholly undeterred they pressed forward actively, adding continually to the scope and efficiency of their work. It was not till 1824 that the first real blow fell. In response to the increasing clamour of the Society's foes, a Royal Commission was then appointed to investigate their operations. In all respects, save one, the report of the Commissioners was a splendid vindication, both of the integrity, and the success of the Society. The solitary exception was the defect upon which O'Connell had fastened. In the opinion of the Commissioners the reading of the Bible without note or comment was universally disliked, and enough in itself to vitiate the Kildare Place system. After the publication of an opinion, at once so clear and so authoritative, it was plain that if the Society meant to retain their grants they must alter their fundamental rules. This they declined to do. Faithful to the principles on which they had been founded, the Committee determined to continue their resistance to the end. Their courage and fidelity did not go unrewarded. Powerful friends such as Peel, now Home Secretary, continued to advocate their support. Their own zeal and skill ensured them an increasing measure of educational success. But the more efficient the Education Society showed themselves to be, the fiercer grew the attacks upon them. When Wellington and Peel unwillingly yielded to the demand for Emancipation in 1829, it was manifest that there were forces at work which could not long be kept at bay. Wellington's retirement in the following year was the signal for the final blow. The end came at the hands of Earl Grey and Mr. Stanley. Not because they altered, but because they refused to alter their principles, the Kildare Place Society went down.

THE educational events of the year 1831 are directly responsible for much of the educational history of the following century. It is therefore right that they should receive a moment's careful attention.

The rising tide of sympathy with Roman Catholics in their disabilities, had found expression in the Emancipation Act, and the founding of the National Board. But it was one thing to tolerate Roman Catholics, quite another to encourage, or even to recognise, their religious views. Accordingly, the National Board commenced with an undenominationalism as absolute as that of the Kildare Place Society; and, in addition, it made no provision whatever for reading the Scriptures. The indignation which this departure aroused in Church circles was as natural as it was vehement. Emancipation had been long resisted, and in the end its concession had been more a matter of necessity than of grace. To find that the next step in this, as it appeared, down-grade policy, seemed to imply the abolition of the Bible from the school, was a discovery full charged with inflammatory material. The train of explosives thus laid was fired by the Kildare Place Society. Themselves smarting at the slight done to efforts which had been wholly disinterested, and marvellously successful, they went in search of means for continuing the Society by voluntary support, and in so doing fixed upon the cry of 'Scriptural Education.' The effect was instantaneous. An interest in the fortunes of the Society, which had no parallel in the years of its prosperity, was aroused not only in Ireland, but in England. Many auxiliary organisations were formed to raise the funds made necessary by the withdrawal of the Government Grants. The voluntary resources increased tenfold. For the moment it looked as if a new era of prosperity had begun.

But it is one thing to formulate a successful cry, another to fulfil the expectations so aroused. The new supporters who rallied round the Society belonged almost without exception to the Established Church. For them Scriptural education meant Church education. So soon as it was recognised that the constitution of the Kildare Place Society could lend itself to no such distinctive work, the interest of churchmen either flagged altogether or turned in another direction. Subscriptions rapidly fell off, and it became manifest that all prospect of successful work upon the original lines was at an end.

It was at this juncture that the Church Education Society was formed. It dates from the year 1839. The indignation caused by the National Board's apparent indifference to all religion, and by its undoubted abolition of the compulsory reading of the Scriptures, was undiminished, and only sought an outlet along which it could move unrestrained. The Church Education Society supplied the want. Continuing the old Kildare Place rule as to the compulsory reading of Scripture by all denominations, and allowing absolute freedom, not alone in the exposition of the Bible, but in the introduction of the Church Catechism, and the Church Formularies generally, the new Society at once recommended itself to the affection and support of churchmen, and started upon its career with a force and authority which to many seemed to promise the speedy destruction of the National Board. Upon its side was ranged almost the whole of the rank and influence of the Church, at a time when outside the Church there was little of individual rank or influence anywhere. No less than seventeen out of the twenty-two Prelates took prominent part in its organisation. The clergy championed the cause in even larger proportions. The leaders of religious thought among the laity were equally decided in its support.

Strange as it may appear, in the light of their original constitution, the Kildare Place Society seem to have viewed the rise of the Church Education Society only with favour. Unable themselves to continue the work of opposing the National Board, they welcomed the arrival of an organisation which approached the task with a genuine prospect of success. From the first every facility was given to the Church Education Society for making use of the experience and advantages of the Model Schools, and in the year 1854 they were given a lease of the whole of the educational premises at Kildare Place. Thus strangely did the Kildare Place Society terminate the work of training teachers, which they had conducted so long and with so much success. Without a struggle, the rigid undenominationalism of the Society for the Education of the Poor was replaced by the fervent denominationalism of the Church Education Society.

Upon the merits and demerits of the long struggle which now ensued between the Church Education Society and the National Board there is no necessity for entering. At best a voluntary organisation is unequally matched when compelled to resist the comparatively unlimited resources which Government can command. In this case, however paradoxical it may seem, the very success and vigour with which the Church Education Society conducted the campaign, prepared the way for their defeat. Warned by the strong feeling which had been aroused, the National Board adopted a policy of conciliation. One by one the more objectionable features of the original system were removed. Successive alterations in the rules made it plain, not only that there was no desire to minimise the importance of religious education, but, what was far more to the point, that scrupulous care was being taken for the encouragement of definite denominational teaching. Thus the Church Education Society found themselves confronted with their own weapons, and it became more and more apparent, not only that conflict was hopeless, but that in reality the need for resistance had disappeared.

The changed situation told rapidly upon the fortunes of the Society. Its immense subscription list dwindled. At one time it had risen as high as £45,000, or more than the Kildare Place Society had enjoyed in the most flourishing period of Government Grants. By 1878 it had sunk to a few thousands. Equally marked was the defection of the Schools; and finally the Training College at Kildare Place, which formed the very centre and mainspring of the work, became involved in difficulties.

It was at this crisis that the Most Rev. Lord Plunket, then Bishop of Meath, first identified himself actively with the fortunes of the College on which he was destined to confer so many benefits. When the Church Education Society reluctantly announced their inability to continue its management, the General Synod determined to take up the work. They entrusted it to their Board of Religious Education, by whom a Sub-Committee was appointed for the purpose. The title adopted was that by which the College has ever since been known—'The Church of Ireland Training College.' The labours of this Committee of the Synod began in 1878; by the close of 1879 we find Lord Plunket acting as its Chairman.

The first idea of the Committee was a revival of the fortunes of the College upon the old basis. Strong efforts were made to enlist sympathy and support on its behalf. For a time there seemed to be some prospect of success. Soon, however, it became plain that if new support was to be obtained permanently from without, reorganisation must be undertaken from within. The necessity for a Training College was recognised; but into the old bottles men were unwilling to pour their new wine.

As the result of the situation thus reached, a long series of negotiations began. Through them all Lord Plunket's was the guiding influence. Three entirely distinct sets of interests had to be considered. All converged upon the Training College. In the background, as it were, stood the old Kildare Place Committee. Though they had long ceased to exercise any active educational functions, they were powerful as being still the legal owners of the College. They were also formidable because the extinction which awaited them, and which they foresaw, had aroused all the instincts of resistance. In immediate but waning possession were the Committee of the College. Many of them were immovably attached to the rigid principles of the Church Education Society. Though conscious that the effective working of the College was fast becoming impossible for themselves, this fact was not likely to lessen the acuteness of their opposition to any proposals under which the influence of the National Board might be traced or suspected. The third set of interests may best be described as those of the Church at large. Taking no active part in the old controversy between the Church Education Society and the National Board, but profoundly convinced of the necessity for a flourishing Training College, there were numbers who were prepared to devote themselves to this end along whatever lines might promise best results. The leadership of this third party naturally devolved upon Lord Plunket. Closely associated with him were the Recorder of Dublin, Sir Frederick Falkiner, and Mr. W. G. Brooke.

PERIOD II

The first forward step of importance was taken by the General Synod in 1882, when a Committee, afterwards known as the Recorder's Committee, was formed, with the object of emancipating the Church's work of training teachers, from the restricted sphere to which it had become confined.

What was wanted was some efficient means of bringing Church influence to bear upon Teachers of National Schools. Already the State Schools were in the majority. Every year added to their number and importance. If the Church were not wholly to abandon her connection with the Teachers, means for reaching them while in training must be devised. The first effort made in this direction had been the appointment of a catechist to visit the undenominational College in Marlborough Street, and to instruct the students in training. But there were few to whom this arrangement was satisfactory, and Churchmen began to ask whether some plan could not be devised whereby the influence of Kildare Place might be enlisted.

The Recorder's Committee was the outcome of this feeling. In the terms of its constituent resolution it was empowered to arrange for a Residence House for the training of male teachers in connection with Marlborough Street Training College.

PERIOD II

For more reasons than one the time of the appointment of this Committee was peculiarly opportune. Not only was there the growing demand for the Church Training of National Teachers, but also the training of non-National Masters by the Church was on the point of being discontinued. At Kildare Place it was a period of great financial difficulty. The funds necessary for carrying on the double work of training both masters and mistresses were becoming more and more unattainable. With sore hearts the Committee had announced that the Male Department must be closed. The resolution, however, was never carried into effect ; its announcement came as a shock to all who had taken an interest in the fortunes of Kildare Place. Protests against the decision, and suggestions as to its reversal, poured in from all quarters.

This was Lord Plunket's opportunity, and he was not slow to use it. Himself always averse to anything of the nature of retreat, he had most unwillingly acquiesced in the closing policy. The moment there seemed a possibility of retracing the backward step he threw himself with all his energy into the movement, and headed a successful appeal for the necessary funds. As a result, new and widespread interest was aroused. Fresh subscriptions came in rapidly,

THE MOST REV. LORD PLUNKET

Archbishop of Dublin

THE RIGHT HON. SIR FREDERICK R. FALKINER

Recorder of Dublin

Hon. Sec. of the Board of Governors, 1884–1908 and the Male Department remained open as before.

Meanwhile the Recorder's Committee had been completing their arrangements, and obtaining the necessary sanction from Government. The plan which met with their approval was the employment of Kildare Place as a residence house, where Church Students from Marlborough Street College might board, attending in the daytime the lectures of the Government Professors at Marlborough Street, and returning to Kildare Place for catechetical instruction, the Church of Ireland Training College being looked upon as their home.

To this plan the Committee of the College made no objection, provided the management of the buildings and of the students remained in their hands. On the contrary, they saw in it a source of strength. Lord Plunket, in particular, welcomed the introduction of the Marlborough Street element. In the spring of 1883 the sanction of the Synod was obtained, and in the autumn of the same year the Bishop himself welcomed a class of eighteen male students to their new quarters.

From the first the experiment succeeded well, and soon the question was asked—Why should not the system be extended to female students? Early in 1884 this thought took practical shape, and the Government was approached.

At this time, however, events were moving rapidly. On the recommendation of the Viceroy, Earl Spencer, the English system of Denominational Training Colleges had been extended to Ireland in 1883. It is therefore not surprising that the request for a 'Boarding House' for mistresses did not find favour. The difficulties of the position thus reached were felt acutely by Lord Plunket. The Boarding House system he was able to defend unhesitatingly. It was 'a new departure,' but 'a departure based upon old principles.' A Denominational College, on the other hand, seemed to present immense difficulties. Still he addressed himself earnestly to the solution of the problem, approaching it, to use his own words of advice to others, 'in large and unprejudiced spirit'; and he succeeded, in concert with his fellow-workers, in striking out a plan which went far towards avoiding even an appearance of a breach of continuity with the past.

In thinking over the situation, the Bishop began to see that it ought to be possible to arrange for a department in the College, which would still carry on the work of training for schools not in connection with the National Board. Thus the old traditions, and the continuity would be preserved. But this was not the only good the prospect held in store. Looked at one way, the coming of the National Board to Kildare Place might spell defeat. But was it not really victory? Did it not promise to make Kildare Place once more a great educational centre—a College whose influence was as wide as the boundaries of the Church, at once the moulder and the inspirer of the lives of the children everywhere? So viewed, the prospect seemed to offer a potent means of healing once for all the controversies of the past. Yet there were many difficulties to be faced before the goal was reached. However clearly Lord Plunket might see the gain of the policy he was adopting, there was only too much reason for fearing that others would see chiefly its superficial drawbacks. The atmosphere of prejudice through which the education question had moved for so long was dark and threatening.

It was, therefore, with anxious feelings that the meeting of the General Synod of 1884 was awaited. A Boarding House for Mistresses had been finally refused, but in its stead a Denominational Training College had been definitely offered. It was for the Synod to decide what course should be pursued.

PERIOD III

1884-1911

WITH no uncertain voice the General Synod of 1884 spoke. A notice in favour of a Denominational College—moved by Mr. W. G. Brooke, and seconded by Mr. Bagwell—was carried without a division, and Lord Plunket welcomed the decision with the utmost thankfulness. There were, no doubt, many obstacles still to be overcome. To organise any large institution in a limited time is a heavy task; the labour is made heavier when undertaken by those whose time is already fully occupied. This, however, was no mere piece of straightforward construction. Upon an old foundation a new institution had to be raised. On the one hand it must form a continuation of the past—heedful of past workers, sympathetic with past work; on the other it must present an appearance wholly new, and must have at command everything which the progress and development of education could suggest. An enterprise fraught with such difficulties as these was certain to make large demands upon the resources and capacities of those by whom it was undertaken.

Happily all this was clearly foreseen. As a preliminary step the Bishop, accompanied by the Recorder, visited a number of the English Training Colleges, and acquired a rich store of information from this source.

Next, influential public meetings were organised. Lord Plunket took the chief part at the Dublin meeting; the Recorder visited Cork. In this way the constitution of the College and its immediate needs were brought before the Church, and subscriptions flowed in so rapidly as to make it certain that there would be no failure for want of financial support.

Finally, the complicated and delicate task of internal renovation was taken up. To select from the former staff any for whom places could be found, to make generous arrangements with those whose services must be discontinued, to gather in from countless applicants a new staff suited to the many and elaborate requirements of the situation, to undertake the complete renewal and refurnishing of the vast pile of buildings which limited resources had for years vainly endeavoured to maintain, to make the necessary arrangements for the formal opening—these in bare outline were the duties which had to be discharged by the beginning of September.

Tuesday, the 9th of September, was the day fixed for the opening of the College; it was a memorable occasion. Gathered in the old school —the scene of so many ceremonials—a great assembly awaited the consummation of the work upon which the eyes of the whole Church had been fixed for months. The rooms themselves bore testimony to the care and taste which had been devoted to the preparation. Prominently placed were the students. In full number they had responded to the invitation to try Kildare Place once more, forming a class whose distinctions soon set the seal to the wisdom of reseeking the old halls. There, too, was the College Staff, some of them proved by long years of service, others as yet untried, all destined to work together with singular unanimity for the achievement of signal success. There, too, also were the Committee, reaping the fruits of their long labour; and there to commend, and give thanks, were met, so far as room allowed, representatives of all that was best among the nobility, the clergy, and the laity of the Church.

Thus happily was the re-foundation of the College accomplished. The work itself was notable, and from the first was generally recognised as such. But even more noteworthy was the beneficial and far-reaching way in which it affected the educational activity of the Church at large. As Lord Plunket had foreseen, the breach which had lasted for fifty years was healed. Now that teachers for Church Education Schools and for National Schools were seen in training side by side, all being engaged in the same studies, whether secular or religious, it was not possible to misread the lesson of unity thus taught. The bitterness of controversy died ; a feeling of mutual help and fellowship reigned in its stead ; reasonable men were once more at one.

The first serious want felt by the College after it had commenced work was the need of a regular subscription list. At its opening, donations for immediate purposes had been liberally given, but regular subscribers were not so easily obtained. To remedy the deficiency, and to place the voluntary funds on a stable basis, public meetings were organised in the principal diocesan centres. The first was held, on the invitation of Primate Knox, at Armagh, in March, 1887. The deputation from Dublin consisted of Lord Plunket (by this time Archbishop of Dublin), the Recorder of Dublin, and the writer. The meeting was eminently successful. The Diocese of Armagh has ever since been one of the chief contributors to the College. The next meeting was held in Belfast; both the Primate and the Archbishop attended and spoke. At Belfast, as at Armagh, the reception given was of the most cordial description. Further meetings were held at Londonderry, Clonmel, and Cork ; they accomplished their object ; no special appeals for revenue have since been required.

Side by side with the efforts on behalf of the income went the movement on behalf of the improvement of the buildings. While for the most part the rooms in use still, are those erected from 1816 to 1825, extensive additions have been made in every part of the premises, more convenient methods of inter-communication have been introduced, and the whole appearance has been so completely revolutionised that no external trace remains of the original plain and unimaginative design.

With the exception that the two great school-rooms had been subdivided by permanent partitions, the buildings remained unaltered until after 1884.

The first undertaking was the present Hall. To provide funds a bazaar was organised which received the support of the whole Church. Each diocese was represented by a stall. Lady Plunket took Dublin; Bishop Knox, at the time he was elected Primate, was active in supporting Mrs. Knox in her stall for Down. In every diocese influential workers gave ready assistance. The large profits which were made enabled the Hall and the Kitchen to be built.

Next came the new wing, which contains the Library and the Model Class Room. Part of the money was borrowed from the Board of Works; the Governors appealed successfully for the rest.

By this time the contrast between the beauty of the new, and the plainness of the old, work was so marked that further improvements became inevitable.

When the Library Wing was opened in February 1890, by the Lord Lieutenant, the Marquis of Zetland, Lord Plunket in a memorable speech compared the new work and the old to Beauty and the Beast, and he appealed at once for help to accomplish a transformation.

The required assistance came sooner than could have been anticipated. Towards the end of the Session of 1891 Mr. A. Balfour, then Chief Secretary for Ireland, introduced a Bill for placing the Denominational Colleges on an equality with the Government College in Marlborough Street, so far as their buildings were concerned. The Marlborough Street buildings had been erected at Government expense. It was proposed to refund to the Colleges the sums which had been provided for their buildings out of private sources. Scarcely was this good news known when it was announced that formidable opposition would be offered to the Bill.

As the Session was far advanced it was manifest that the situation was critical. The Archbishop accordingly determined that no effort on his part should be wanting to ensure the safety of the Bill. Accompanied by the writer he went to London in the middle of July, and spent the rest of the month drawing up parliamentary documents, attending the House, canvassing members, and interviewing the Government. The amount of hard clerical and physical work which he underwent would be almost incredible to anyone who had not witnessed it. Early and late he toiled, never missing an opportunity of gaining a point.

In the end the benefits for which the Archbishop had striven so strenuously were secured. The determined obstruction offered made it inadvisable to press the Bill as originally introduced, but an equally favourable alternative proposal was brought forward and carried, whereby a terminable series of building grants was voted to each of the existing Denominational Training Colleges.

With the help of these grants it has been possible to carry the College buildings gradually to successful completion. During Lord Plunket's managership the 'Model Schools' received a new front; cloisters and an underground passage were planned for the convenient connection of the different departments; the clock tower, the gymnasium, and a set of class rooms, were built.

When the present Archbishop succeeded to the managership in 1896, that portion of the College which adjoins Kildare Street was still untouched. It had, however, been decided that the Church Memorial to Lord Plunket should be a new front looking towards Kildare Place. The inscription upon this front was drawn up by the Archbishop, and under his guidance the whole of the remaining building operations have been conducted step by step. The last stage was reached in 1907, when the long front in Kildare Street was completed.

It is gratifying, in connection with the buildings, to be able to place on record the substantial help which has come from former students. To their exertions and generosity are due the organ which adorns the hall, and the handsome oak bookcases and fittings in the library. To them also must be given much of the credit for the Kildare Place Memorial Front. Its inscription recalls the fact that nearly one-third of the total cost was raised by those who had once been students in the Church of Ireland Training College.

For evidence as to the position which has been accorded to Kildare Place Teachers, reference may be made to the particulars given in the alphabetical list, pp. 61-101. The appointments given in the list show that in every county and important town in Ireland schools of the first rank have been supplied from Kildare Place. Of those who have moved from teaching to other work no fewer than twenty-nine masters,

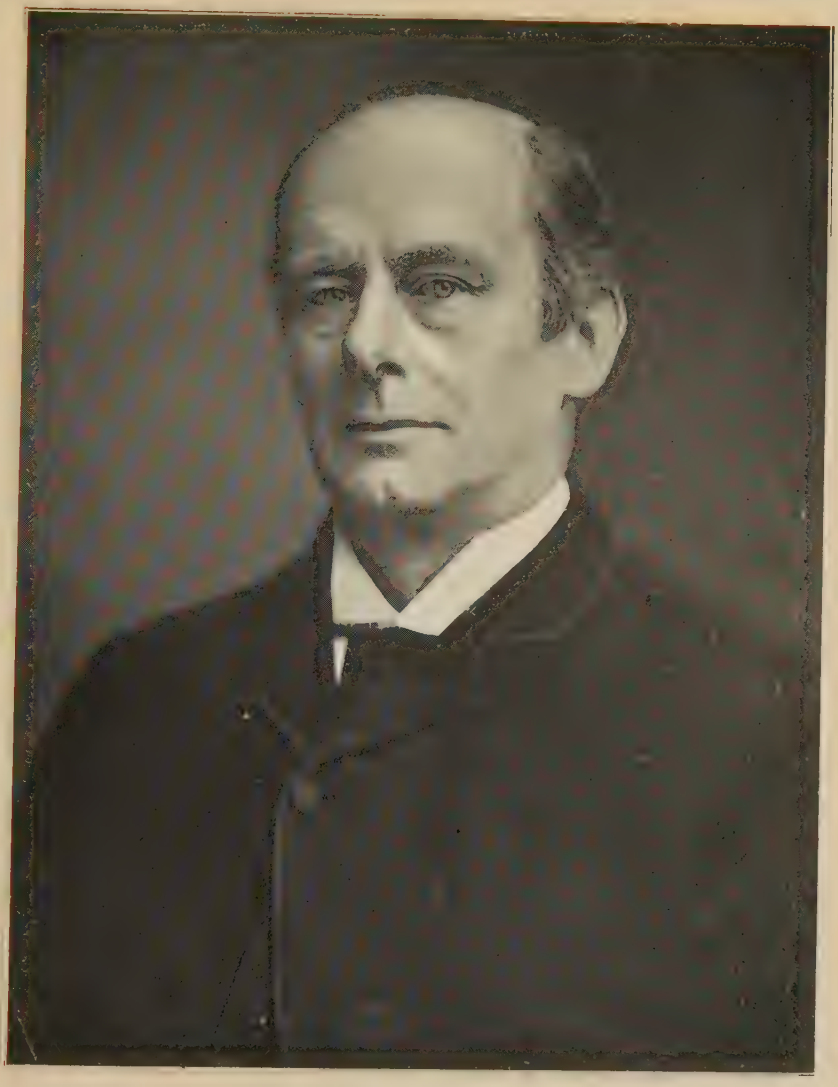
This list of distinctions won for success in the art of teaching leads naturally to brief but grateful mention, of those who have helped by their gifts to emphasise the cultivation of correct methods, and of the other College benefactors.

The Wilson and Suffern Gold and Silver Medals for the best Woman Teacher of the year, and the Mackay Wilson Gold and Silver Medals for the best Teacher of Holy Scripture among the men, have been founded by Mr. and Mrs. Mackay Wilson. Mrs. Brien has founded Prizes for the study of History, and for Needlework. Mr. Wood Latimer has founded an Essay Prize. It is a pleasure to know that all these Donors are with us still. Among those who have passed away special mention is due to Inspector-General Mullins. During his lifetime as "The London Friend" his gifts were many and generous. In his will he left upwards of £1,000 to enable the College to give prizes annually to all successful students.

Among the governors who have died, in addition to Lord Plunket, mention has been made of the Recorder of Dublin, the Right Hon. Sir F. R. Falkiner, and Mr. W. G. Brooke. Also conspicuous was the Right Hon. Lord Justice FitzGibbon; his splendid eloquence was always willingly placed at the disposal of the College, and to his Commission was due the present Constitution.



THE RIGHT HON. GERALD FITZGIBBON

Lord Justice of Appeal

Governor of the Church of Ireland Training College, 1884–1909

If it may be permitted to allude to the present, none will be found insensible to the deep interest shown by the Archbishop of Dublin, and to his zeal in maintaining the position of the College, and in demonstrating its vital importance to the Church.

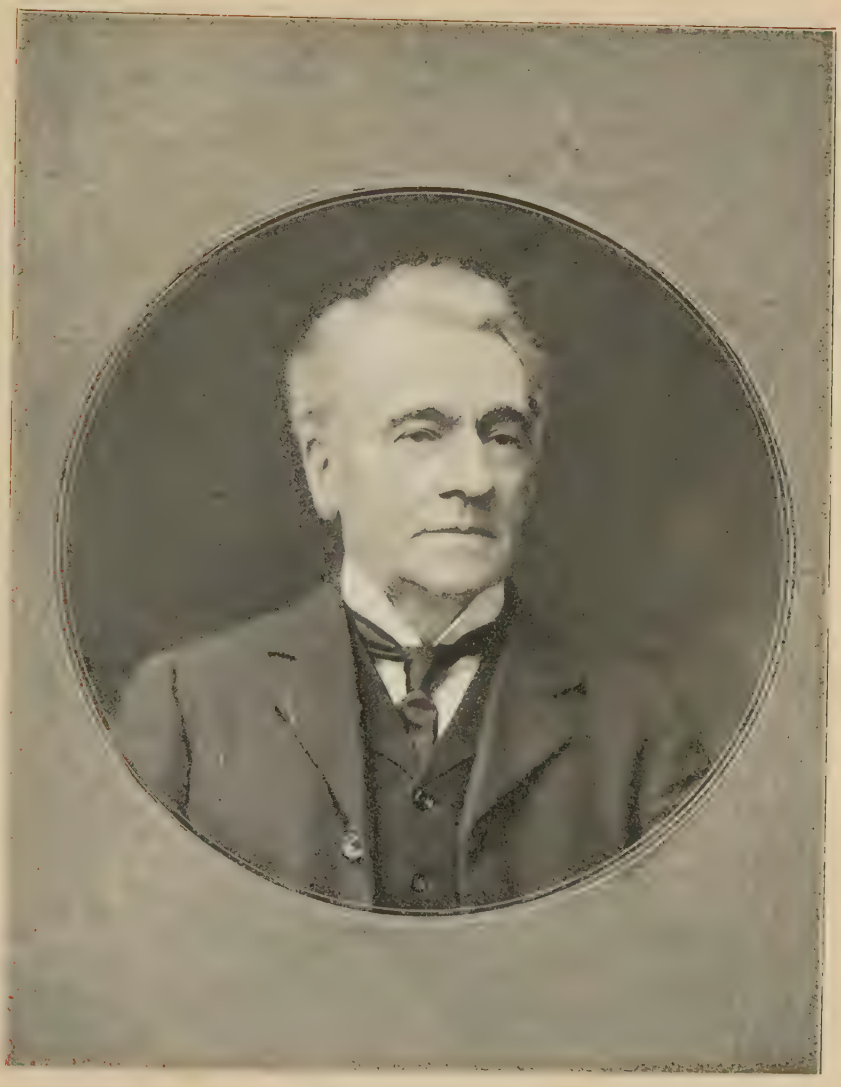
Among the workers whose memory abides Miss Jane Lewis is affectionately recalled by her portrait in the Hall and by the Lewis Memorial Medal, given annually for the best Woman Teacher of Holy Scripture.

The Rev. Alexander Leeper, D.D., Canon of St. Patrick's, closed a long life, most of which had been connected with the Church Education Society, as Chaplain of the College.

Miss Margaret Kennedy was called to her rest after seven years of devoted service as head of the Infant School, where a tablet perpetuates her memory.

Miss Annie Lloyd Evans, who was Lady Superintendent from 1898 to 1908, is now Principal of Fulham Training College, London—a position which her high qualifications enable her to fill with much distinction.

But while there have been some gaps a much more remarkable fact is the continuity, which for now upwards of twenty-six years has been maintained. The writer as Principal, and the four Professors—Prof. J. C. Rea, Prof. L. E.



MR. C. O. GRANDISON

Principal Teacher of Instrumental Music, 1884-Jan. 1911

Composer of the Music for 'The College Song' and
'The Centenary Ode'

Steele, Prof. J. Cooke and Prof. J. Henley—are as they were in 1884; and the same may be said of Miss M. J. Smith, Miss A. Brown, Miss Heron and Mrs. Blake.

It is a matter of deep regret that during the preparation of this book Mr. C. O. Grandison, who had been responsible for the Instrumental Music since 1884, has been suddenly called to his rest. His memory will be long cherished by those who knew him, and his beautiful music for 'The College Song' and the 'Centenary Ode'—which had only just been completed—will ensure the perpetuation of his name at Kildare Place.

As concerns the general history of the College since 1884—its educational policy, its effect upon the schools of the Church, its public influence—these are matters of which others must speak. The writer, as Principal, and Governor, has been inseparably and intimately connected with all that has been planned and accomplished; those who stand within find difficulty in adjusting themselves to an outside estimate; where the affections are deeply engaged it is not easy to act as judge. All, therefore, that will be attempted will be a few extracts from official reports. In this way it will be possible for the CENTENARY BOOK to conclude by giving some glimpses of the College as others see it.

FROM REPORTS OF THE INSPECTOR OF CHURCH TRAINING COLLEGES TO THE ARCHBISHOPS OF CANTERBURY & YORK

THE REV. BERNARD REYNOLDS, M.A.
Prebendary of St. Paul's Cathedral.

1905 "Dublin.—It was a great pleasure to visit this excellent College, from which we in England have much to learn; everything is, of course, quite different from what it is in England, and the Inspector felt rather that he was the inspected. It is to be hoped he profited by the experience."

The Archbishop of Canterbury's message to that College has been much welcomed.

1909 "Dublin is quite amongst the excellent Colleges. It stands most decidedly in the Colleges which I put first. I have not the slightest hesitation in stating this. It gave me the greatest pleasure to visit you, and the reality of the work and the high aim and tone were most marked."

"It is abundantly evident that the College is doing spiritual and helpful work of an effective and excellent character."

LIST OF TEACHERS

TRAINED AT THE CHURCH OF IRELAND TRAINING COLLEGE—GOVERNMENT AND NON-GOVERNMENT

This List aims at containing:—

1. The names and schools of all Government Teachers who have been awarded Diplomas, and are believed to be still teaching, together, with the present occupations, where known, of those who have ceased teaching, and the names of many who are married.

2. Names of Teachers who have not taught long enough to earn a Diploma.

3. Names of all Students in Residence at the time of the Centenary.

4. Non-Government Teachers who are believed to be still engaged in teaching.

The Schools have been ascertained with as much care as it was possible to exercise, but owing to information from the Teachers themselves being sometimes not available, there may be cases in which the School given is not the last.

Notwithstanding that much trouble has been taken to make the List complete, there remain blanks which fuller information would have filled.
